Split Daewoo Link

A: You are using the wrong drivers, or not good ones. I suggest you this driver from the RealTek website. Q: How to do a "semi-promiscuous" I2C bus scan? Background I'm working on a project that interacts with several different bit devices over I2C. I'm hoping to create some sort of read/write simulation using non-I2C circuits to emulate the response time of the actual devices. So, I'm using four 74HC14's in order to be able to simulate the response to a single I2C transaction. That's a trade-off I'm willing to make for the overall simplicity of the circuit. Question Is it possible to communicate with non-I2C devices using I2C? For instance, can I use the SDA and SCL signals from the "I2C bus" to communicate with a 74HC14? If so, would that be a good idea, given that I'm modifying the SDA and SCL signals? How would I make sure the message is decoded properly? A: Maybe not a straightforward yes or no answer, but still kind of. The 71HC04 is an I2C addressable chip. The datasheet will tell you what the I2C address is, and then you can add a second SCL and/or SDA line, and you will have a device that communicates with I2C devices. This is over-specified, and will likely not work (depending on the configuration of the other devices on the I2C bus), but it may be interesting to do. EDIT: the datasheet will give you the I2C address, which should be the same address you used for the "non-I2C bus" chips. You can use the device at address $0000 with a BSC (bit-sliced clock) mode. In the datasheet for the 71HC04, if you look at the bitrate for BSC mode, you will see it can be 1kHz. So a standard microcontroller (e.g. PIC12F683) can be used to drive both I2C devices, and the bytes will propagate across the bus at around 1kHz. You probably do not want to use the SDA or SCL in parallel with an I2C bus, because the SDA or SCL
